Silhouette On A Thumbnai

Bill Brown

Light flickered on the dark face circled around the native campfire in Macheke, South Africa. The white men stood next to the fire. Talking to a group, one of the blacks stepped toward the circle and spoke briefly in the language of the whites. The group turned, giving orders to the blacks who were crouched behind the nets with spears and started moving out into the jungle night.

The column moved slowly for three hours, passing finally at the base of a conical hill. Here the white men dispersed the two hundred natives and stationed them at close intervals around the base of the hill. The group settled down to wait for the first light of dawn.

Eighteen-year-old Bill Brown, the youngest of the party, stayed next to the fire talking to a group of blacks about the hunt. He was five years young. Aside from a two-year visit to Harvard in 1916, he has been overseas for the rest of his year.

His father, a medical missionary, moved to Northern Rhodesia in 1929 to found a mission school and hospital at Kalwena. When the family returned to Africa, from Harvard in 1930, the Brownes founded a new mission of Macheke in Southern Rhodesia.

Then Bill moved to Bording School in Salisbury. In November, 1941, he made plans to return to the United States and enroll in the “City of New York” to start his medical training. His sailing date was December first, but the Nazis beat him to the ship. They took him and his plans to return to the States, for the ship company cancelled all passenger lists.

Bill entered on a mission mission in charge of school personnel and activities until his membership in the British Reserve forces was cancelled by the U.S. Army. The long arm of the law reached across the Atlantic and snapped young Brown on the shoulder in 1945. Bill went from North Africa to Germany where he was finally released from duty in June, 1946.

After a nine years absence Bill was back at Harvard. He plans to finish “pre-med” here and follow his brother, now enroute to Africa to serve his father, through the University of Tennessee.

Some, who can say —— Robert may need a “relief” by then.

The native below began to shout as scared apes crashed into their nets. A rope was thrown across the opening yelling as the natives wielded their spears on the smoking baboons. From the hill-side was awl with the dry smell of blood and the overwhelming odor of fresh blood. The confusion died down slowly, until the noise became sporadic as single apes were hunted down and killed.

Toward noon the hunt was over and a final tally added up to over a hundred dead baboons. The native gathered his spoils and headed back for the village, giving orders to the natives who were crouched behind the nets with spears and headed back for the village.

Before he could finish the job, Bill moved to the western slope, began his patrol. As he followed Bill yelled at his gun-boat to follow as he struggled up the steep slope toward the crest of the hill.

On the hill-side he could see three shapes running for cover. He fired from the hip as a large baboon lunged at him from a rock cave. The shot hit him in the middle and doubled him up on the flat rock.

Other baboons came from the cave and started climbing the rocks aside, fearlessly to escape. Brown emplaced his .303 in them and took his short-gun from the butcher who was keeping well back of the action. Brown fired point-blank into a confused welter of brown forms.
