

SOCIAL CLUBS

Social clubs open the door for making new friends, experiencing fun activities, connecting to alumni and, most importantly, strengthening our walk with Christ. Social clubs build strong relationships between their members, yet they are not exclusive. Clubs come together to serve, to cheer, to compete and to encourage one another. Games and devotionals survive in our memories with the help of the pictures on these pages. Once the photographs are taken and the story is written, they are placed in this time capsule for club members to enjoy once more down the road. The moments that are captured here help bring back beautiful memories for members to reminisce and remember why it was great to be at Harding with our club brothers and sisters.

RECEPTIONS

RECRUITMENT IN FULL SWING

September was marked with enthusiasm and eagerness as 31 social clubs geared up to receive prospective members. The clubs hosted three mixers each, making for a total of 93 individual receptions.

"The receptions are really important because those are some of the first interactions the girls have with older members in the club," senior Chelsea Bradley, vice president of women's social club Zeta Rho, said. "Those are their first memories of the club, and I think that's why it is so important."

Every club dedicated at least one officer position to planning and preparing for the recruitment and induction processes.

"We probably started around June," senior Laura Beth McKinley, vice president of women's social club Delta Gamma Rho, said. "We have been calling different places on campus, making reservations, also planning different themes for our mixers, and also for club week."

Coordinating plans and ideas could become cumbersome for these officers during the summer when they were not together.

"There were some times when it was more challenging, just 'cause we were both really busy this summer, and it was hard to see what each other were trying to communicate," Bradley said. "It was also hard to get motivated to plan because it was summer."

While challenges and difficulties filled the preparation process, officers completed their work and submitted their plans to the Office of Student Life by the beginning of the semester. All of their work and preparation came to fruition before their eyes as hundreds of prospective members met current members at the receptions.

"I hope that every member ... puts forth the most effort they can and really [tries] to be a part of the club," senior Woody Weeks, vice president of men's social club TNT, said. "At the end, I hope that everybody has respect for each other and feels closer to each other and feels like the whole club has bonded."

According to the 2014-2015 Social Club Handbook, social clubs were to be rooted in Christian principles. Many of the officers entrusted with the club process included prayer as a part of their planning and preparation. For all their own hard work, the officers knew that a meaningful club experience took more than good ideas and organization.

"I have prayed for the seniors, who are experiencing this for that last time, and that they find fulfillment in it," Bradley said. "I've prayed that it is meaningful, specifically for the girls coming into the club."

CELEBRATES 10 YEARS

In the spring, women's club Pi Theta Phi celebrated 10 years of sisterhood on campus. To mark the occasion, the club held an event entitled "A Decade of Pi" in March, the month it first received its charter in 2004.

The anniversary celebration was open to past and present PTP members, beaux and sponsors. Highlighting its 10-year theme, the club split into groups and dressed in the styles of various decades. The party's main entertainment, a scavenger hunt, included taking a group picture at the club-famous birthplace of PTP: the balcony of Pattie Cobb Hall.

Senior Natalie Smith, president of PTP, said she gained new confidence in the club after the event.

"I had only been in the club for a couple years, but I could still tell a difference after because once you reach any kind of milestone you just feel stronger," Smith said. "You feel more unified."

To reconnect with past members, PTP made a 10th-anniversary shirt and advertised it on the club's Facebook page. They then sold the anniversary shirts to club alumni all over the country.

Betsy Ganus, a sponsor and member of PTP's second class of inductees, said despite some changes, like the club's rapid growth, the heart of the club remained the same.

"After coming back as a sponsor, I felt like the club was exactly the same as when I had left as a student. It just had different people now," Ganus said. "It was weird to me that I didn't know any of them because it felt so familiar to me."

Ganus said that PTP usually attracted girls with hearts for missions and ministry; a number of club alumni worked in ministry-related jobs. Former members were impressed with the club's growth and renewed focus on mission work.

In addition to celebrating the club's beginning, PTP officers became more conscious of the legacy they were building as the year continued. Junior Kelby Czerwonka, vice president of PTP, said she felt particularly responsible for choosing new club members. After all, these inductees would determine the next 10 years of the club. Czerwonka said she expected PTP to grow as a club that would continue to attract many leaders and strive to serve God more than it had in the past.

TNT MAINTAINS TRADITION

Most social clubs on campus attempted to create and maintain certain traditions to pass down through generations. The men's social club TNT was among several that succeeded in this endeavor. Tradition permeated everything TNT did, most notably their spring formal, the Blue Banquet.

According to senior Patrick Brimberry, TNT held the banquet every spring since the club's formation in 1933, and they had booked the same venue for the occasion since 1965. Brimberry said the venue, The Red Apple Inn, remained a fixture of the event.

"Every year when we go in [The Red Apple Inn], they know exactly who we are, they know exactly what we're doing, and they always make sure the place is reserved for the whole day," Brimberry said. "It's a good relationship we have with the owners there, and they expect us every year."

Though the recurring venue provided a familiar atmosphere, it did not define the Blue Banquet. According to Brimberry, the members put a lot of time, effort and thought into creating a surprise "blue gift" for their dates. A blue gift could be any object as long as it was painted blue and white, the TNT club colors.

"My wife and I always go early to look at the blue gifts," TNT sponsor Travis McNeal, assistant professor of behavioral science, said. "They are funny; they are impressive; they are really creative, and they are part of what makes the Blue Banquet such a special tradition. I know in the past we've had swords, guillotines and full couches painted blue. Anything you can think of has probably been made into a blue gift."

According to junior Austin Yates, the members took pride in making the gifts, and they looked forward to the reactions of their dates.

"One of the things that makes Blue Banquet special is that at other functions you show up, eat food and then you go home," Yates said. "Those are fun, but you don't really put any effort into them. At Blue Banquet, every single person who goes has put effort into making it special. So, in a small way, the success of the banquet rides on you. People are invested in it, and that's what separates it from other formals."

Everything about the Blue Banquet, from the venue to the blue gifts, screamed tradition. McNeal said that although some might find the repetition boring, the members of TNT took pride in the custom.

"TNT is such a traditional club," McNeal said. "I think that because there is tradition, the members feel like they are a part of something bigger than themselves. They know that people 20 years ago did the same things, and it is really neat to see the consistency."

BURNING

In the spring, members of men's social club Chi Sigma Alpha fought for the best vantage points all over campus as the annual club-wide game of "Assassins" claimed its victims. To begin play, members received an identification card in their mailbox with the name and face of their first target on it. They also received their weapon: a rubber band that was used to "assassinate" the target by snapping him with it in the presence of only one witness. The assassins were organized in a circular network, making everyone a target. When an assassin claimed his victim, he then acquired that victim's target.

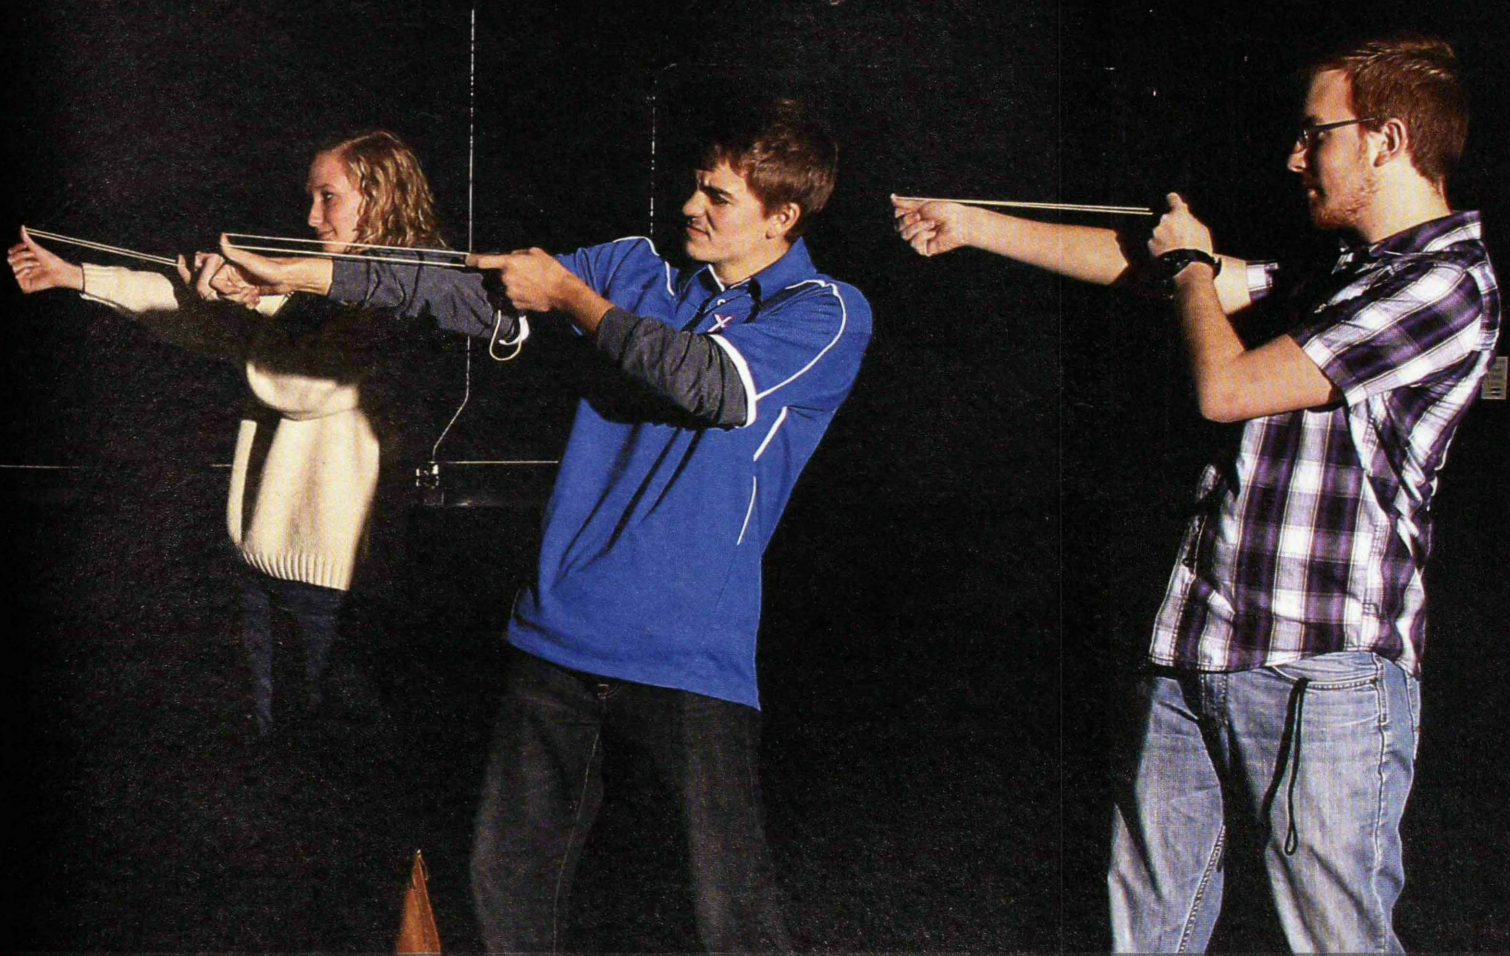

"You slowly kill people off, and then you get their target and the circle gets smaller and smaller and smaller," junior Aaron West said.

The club designated "godfathers" — the ones responsible for organizing and moderating the game — to make sure play remained fair, because club members became highly competitive. The assassins went to great lengths to gain club glory and pride by winning the game.

"If you really want to stay alive, you have to say goodbye to your social life," West said. "So you hole up in your room and don't let anyone in including your suitemates, but that's not a fun way to live. If you're a human being, you're going to die eventually."

RUBBER

2014 alumna Erica Beaman won the game in the spring, becoming the first queen to ever win Assassins. According to Beaman, winning required patience and diligence.

"It's all about strategy. You have to stay in groups," Beaman said. "It's nerve-racking. It's really terrifying at all times. You never trust anybody."

While the game seemingly caused tension with broken alliances and co-conspirators, Assassins served a much greater purpose for Chi Sigma Alpha. It helped club members grow closer to each other in a unique way.

"It definitely brings the whole club together," Beaman said. "It gets you in contact with people that you normally wouldn't talk to in the club."

Above all else, Assassins reaffirmed the identity of the club. Members saw Assassins as a direct reflection of the type of people that were in Chi Sigma Alpha.

"The thing about Chi Sigs is that we're close-knit," freshman Chase Adair said. "We're a large club with a small-club atmosphere. While we have a lot of people in our club, we like making personal relationships between everybody in the club. I think Chi Sig Assassins is just a way to show our fun side and that we enjoy having a good time."

NEW RULES, NEW FOCUS.

Though traditions played an important part in the social club process, the mental, physical and spiritual state of club participants had to come first. At one time, club week activities often lasted all day, from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. However, beginning in 2011, clubs restricted that time to just five hours between 5 and 10 p.m. to respect students' academic responsibilities. According to Dean of Students Zach Neal, the administration also began to increase communication concerning Arkansas' anti-hazing laws, meaning the clubs had to renege on some traditions that did not comply.

Senior Cooper Riggs joined the men's social club Beta Omega Chi in 2010, the last year before the new club week schedule was established. Riggs said that even though his long days during club week were stressful and ridiculous at times, he enjoyed it.

"[Club week] used to be described as 'the most fun you never want to have again,'" Riggs said. "All the stuff you did was fun, but it was incredibly stressful. Since the physical stuff has always been a little taboo, the older members would make you write essays to earn their signatures. There was a lot of stress because you would get back to your dorm room and have seven different essays to write to get signatures. ... I loved and hated every minute of it."

According to Tish Elrod, a 27-year sponsor for the women's social club Ko Jo Kai and clerk in the business office, the university had tried multiple times before to communicate anti-hazing rules, but these attempts "fizzled out" each time. Elrod said at one time a review team comprised of faculty, staff, students and deans questioned the officers of each club about their intentions during club week.

"It worked for a year or two," Elrod said. "Then, because there was a few members who went through [club week] the old way and who had traditions they felt like they needed to follow, it became hard to draw the line between hazing and traditions. I had the president and vice president of the club sitting on my couch saying, 'We've got to change this tradition — what do we do?' I said, 'You can start a new one.'"

By putting their new members' well-being first, social clubs filled the void created by anti-hazing laws with new traditions, establishing a different kind of legacy. The week's principal activity, the all-club devo, also experienced a change in focus. Rather than emphasizing differences, it became a time for clubs to rally together in support of one another.

"All-club devo has really brought things together — just watching the interaction with the clubs, whether it's cheering for the clubs as they do something, or clapping with them, or joining in," Elrod said. "I think that's something that's important for clubs to break down a lot of the barriers."

Neal highlighted the constructive nature of the new club week. Students were students most importantly, and restricting club activities until after 5 p.m. allowed them to get the most out of both the week and their education. Club week was an extracurricular activity, but it also represented the kind of community that students formed at all times of the year.

"What takes place during club week is really a reflection of the community of mission seen on campus," Neal said. "That is simply creating opportunities to experience wholesome activities together and build relationships."

The Messy Games

BUILDING RELATIONSHIPS THROUGH THE MESS

While some of the 31 social clubs on campus were nearly as old as the university itself, others were still establishing themselves in 2014 after only a few semesters of activity. Club week provided an opportunity for the new clubs on campus to spring forward in their involvement with other clubs. Four new clubs hosted the "Messy Games" as an event to unite their members, both within and between the clubs.

Senior Katherine Embry, vice president of women's social club Sigma Phi Mu, said the clubs held a tug of war contest and a shaving cream war. Each club attempted to protect their own queens or beaux while also trying to cover those of other clubs in as much shaving cream as possible.

"I think as a new club it is good for us to not limit ourselves to only interacting with certain clubs," Embry said.

Embry said that Sigma Phi Mu wanted to reach out to women's social club Phi Kappa Delta because it was their first-ever club week.

"We have all recently been through the process of starting a new club and trying to form traditions," Embry said. "We felt that this activity would be a good way to make some contacts among these clubs. We have experienced and are still experiencing many of the same things as we try to establish our clubs on campus."

Embry said that as a new club, Sigma Phi Mu sought variety in their club week interactions. Having done an activity with Omega Phi for two previous years, they enjoyed bringing the two new clubs, Phi Kappa Delta and men's social club Sigma Nu Epsilon, together for the Messy Games.

Junior Adam Baker, member of men's social club Omega Phi, said the new clubs decided to play the Messy Games together because of their common ground. The games broke down the barriers between clubs, focusing on similarities rather than differences.

"I see these games as opportunities to forget that the clubs even exist," Baker said. "We are running around covered in shaving cream, and everyone is indistinguishable; you can't tell who is who. Everyone is the same. We can get stuck on what colors we might wear on Friday, and it is sad because that is the only difference between us."

Sophomore Lindsey Ledford, vice president of Phi Kappa Delta, said that the games helped unify their club.

"Playing [tug of war] unified our girls because they each had to pull their own weight and realized that if everyone does their part, they have a better chance of winning," Ledford said. "Overall the girls grew closer to each other and the other clubs present."

According to Baker, the Messy Games mattered to these clubs because they had not yet developed their identities.

"We are all still trying to distinguish ourselves at Harding," Baker said. "There isn't any history or stereotype that defines us yet."

GIVING BACK

On April 24, the ladies of Ko Jo Kai and Ju Go Ju teamed up to host their annual KJK/JGJ basket bid at College Church of Christ. Women from both clubs partnered to make around 30 dinner baskets to auction off at the event. When the auction closed, the highest bidder on each basket won both the meal inside and the chance to eat with the girls who put the basket together.

The event provided not only food and fun but also a service opportunity — 100 percent of the proceeds went to a family in Honduras who needed $5,000 to buy land. According to senior Chelsea Reid, service director for JGJ, the group felt a personal connection to this cause because one of their members had visited Honduras.

As early as February, event directors from both clubs began planning the project. Reid was responsible for contacting physical resources and College Church to secure a facility for the event. She also publicized the event through word of mouth and by asking queens in both KJK and JGJ to tell their men's clubs about the basket bid.

On the day of the event, approximately 60 men attended to make their bids. Though everyone said they had a good time, senior JGJ member Michaela Harris left the event more touched by the outpouring of love for the Honduran family.

"It felt good to know that so many people cared about raising money for the family in Honduras," Harris said.

By the end of the evening, the women of JGJ and KJK raised $800 toward their goal, averaging nearly $27 per basket. According to Harris, each club member put careful effort into her basket, making it well worth the time of the men who came to bid. Reid was pleased to see everyone's hard work pay off.

"I was through-the-roof excited about how well it went," Reid said. "It went better than I ever expected."

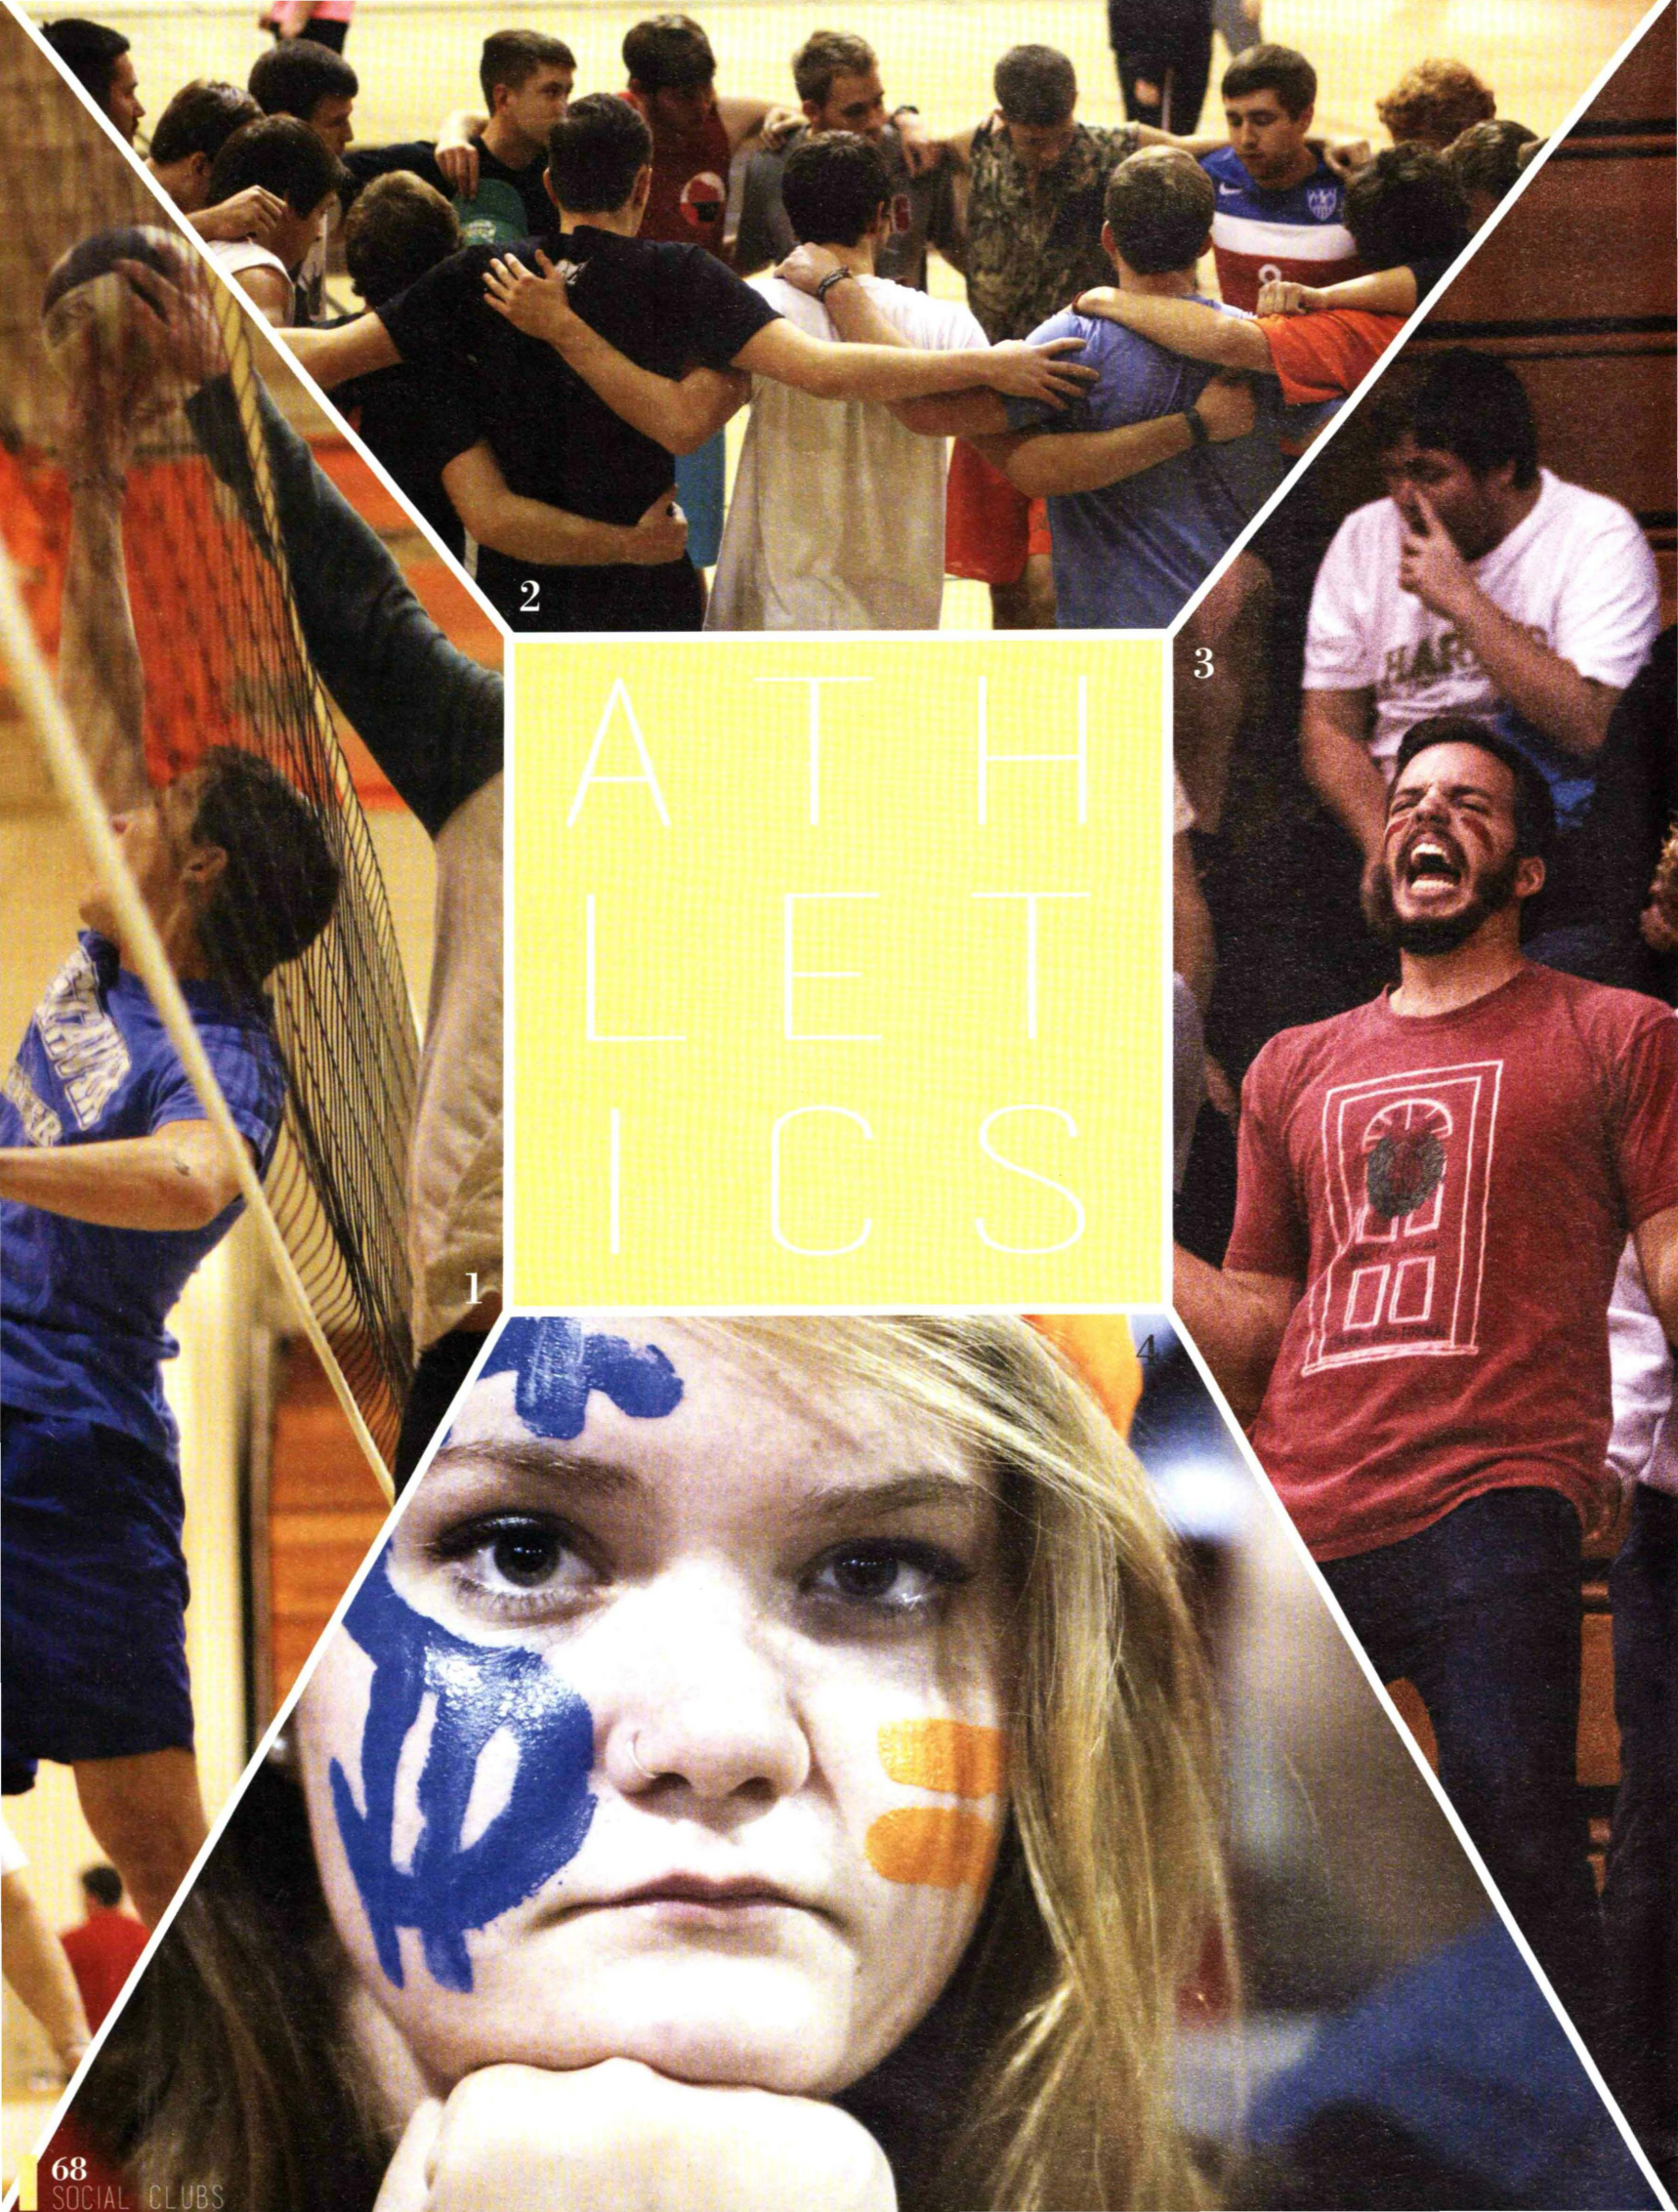

For junior Sara Anne Gill, service director for KJK, the event was more than just a fundraiser — it was a time for diverse groups of people to come together in support of a common goal.

"I liked seeing how many different people showed up for one event and one cause," Gill said.

Though the Basket Bid offered food and fun, it also forged connections between clubs and strengthened relationships within them.

ATHLETICS

GOING THE EXTRA MILE

The social club athletics program was designed to provide students with a diverse range of recreational activities. While the championship games for softball, flag football, volleyball and soccer each brought in hundreds of spectators, smaller athletic events like the swim meet and the track and field meet did not normally draw such crowds. Jim Gowen, director of men's and women's club athletics, believed that all sports were created equal, from the football field to the swimming pool.

"Point-wise, they're essentially the same," Gowen said. "It is a team sport, and at the end of the meet, all the points will be totaled up, and the club with the most points wins the meet. The winning club will then receive the most All Sports Award points. Football, for instance, might be considered the dominant sport, but for the student who is a sprinter, track will be more important to him. All of the sports have their place."

While the other sports were conducted over the span of two to three weeks, the swim meet and the track and field meet were held as one-day events. The swim meet took place in late February, and the track and field meet was held in early April.

The swim meet normally lasted for about two hours, consisting of three relays and five individual events including the 50-yard freestyle, the 50-yard backstroke and the 200-yard freestyle relay. Men's and women's swim meets were held separately in the Harding pool located in the Ganus Athletic Center.

Senior Philip Habegger, a member of TNT, swam competitively for the majority of his life and had participated in every club swim meet since his freshman year.

"I'm not very good at the other sports," Habegger said. "Swimming is the one thing I've been good at. It's something that I've put a lot of work into. It's my one chance to get out there to compete and have fun swimming."

The track and field meet ordinarily lasted about three and a half hours, beginning with field events — the long jump, high jump, discus throw and shot put. Students then moved on to the track events, including the individual dashes, the individual high hurdles and low hurdles, and the team relays. Junior McKenna Smith, athletic director for women's social club Ko Jo Kai, competed in the track and field events during her freshman year.

"The track meet was a lot of fun but still super competitive," Smith said. "I didn't know what to expect because I've never done track before. Growing up, I did basketball and soccer, so I never had time to do track. ... I like the track meet because it gives me the chance to do something I [have] never done before."

Any club member in good standing was eligible to take part in the two meets, whether or not they had previous experience. Both the swim and track and field meets allowed students, especially those who never had the chance to compete in high school, to display their skill in their preferred sport.
